The background of the poster is an abstract artwork. It features a white surface with several large, black, angular shapes that resemble torn paper or tape. A prominent vertical strip of white, crumpled fabric or paper is attached to the right side. On the left, there are dark, geometric patterns that look like shadows or stencils of architectural elements.

Press release

« Choosing images, then recycling them by associating them with other materials: this is the gesture-cycle that structures Meredyth Sparks' work.

The photographs that serve as a substrate in her oeuvre date from the 1970s, a watershed decade in that it saw both the apogee and the decline of political utopias and the counterculture, the culmination of Leftist radicalism and its abrupt repudiation. The tipping point came in 1979: year of the election of Margaret Thatcher in the United Kingdom and Ronald Reagan in the United States, but also of the beginnings of religious fundamentalism, with the seizing of power by Ayatollah Khomeini in Iran.

In cultural terms 1979 was the year of New Wave, a musical current that took the energy of punk towards more complex, less flamboyant forms and, with its apologia for emotional coldness, individualism and raw energy, marked a definitive break with the ideals of hippiedom. Even so, New Wave was an extension of the sixties-generation underground: substituting a black-and-white minimalism, often inspired by Russian Constructivism and German Expressionist cinema of the 1920s, for the multicolored, curvilinear, naively exuberant iconography of the Flower Power years; and swapping the glorification of nature for a panegyric to artifice, the chemical and the industrial.

[...] In Meredyth Sparks' work the abstract forms overlaid on and cutting across the source material give concrete expression to this process of recomposition, while at the same time pointing to a gap, a void that separates us from that material. In Pierrot le Fou Godard quotes art historian Elie Faure: "Velázquez does not paint things, he paints the spaces between them." An exercise in visual displacement, then: it is no longer a matter of studying the positive, solid shapes, but their opposites, the ones that govern their spatial relationships and movement. Sparks' work consists in producing a visual and mental discrepancy between images and forms, between a photograph's cult value and its exchange value. Initially we perceive an item of information from the past, which seems to be flickering through the mists of time expressed as a layer of abstract geometrical shapes. Evocative of the most radical modernism, these shapes glitter or shine, seemingly confronting the viewer with his own scopic impulse. Visually they hamper as much as they reveal. »

"From my perspective, nostalgia of this sort is retrograde and my installation at Elizabeth Dee, and to a lesser degree at Frank Elbaz, aimed to disrupt the viewer's ability to gaze at the performer or political figure directly. By packing the images on the wall and breaking up the space of the gallery with the Gudrun in Sequence screen, for instance, the viewer is given very little space in which to move and ultimately, there is no ideal position or place from which to view the work. This instability is important to my work because it is a way of immersing the viewer in the space, implicating them in the performative act." (Quotation by Meredyth Sparks from an unpublished correspondence with the Author)
